HBV-light allows many model runs to be carried out easily with randomly generated parameter sets by using the tool "Monte Carlo Runs". In this exercise you are asked to perform both sensitivity studies (allowing one or two parameter values to vary) and parameter uncertainty estimations (allowing all (many) parameters to vary).

For each glacierized part of an elevation zone in HBV-light, the corresponding non-glacierized part is used to exchange the area for which the state changed from glacier to non-glacier and vice versa. In order to ensure the water balance is correct, "bookkeeping" is done between the corresponding glacierized and non-glacierized zones.

In the HBV-light version, the non-linear differential equation for estimating the groundwater recharge (Eq. (A1)) is solved numerically by adding the inputs to the soil-moisture reservoir in increments of 1 mm. Actual evaporation is computed based on the average value of SM at the beginning and end of each modelling time-step.
